

1. Social Media: Instagram
2. Topic Chosen: Users' ability to close/delete their accounts
3. Here at InstaShare, we know sometimes people want a break or want to leave. You can control your account like this:
 - Temporary Deactivation: Hide your profile, posts, and comments until you log back in.
 - Permanent Deletion: Delete all your info, photos, messages, and posts. Some stuff might stay in backups for legal/security reasons, but no one else can see it.
 - Notification: We'll email you when your account is successfully deactivated or deleted.
 - Download Data: You can save your photos/posts before deleting your account.

We want leaving to be easy, clear, and under your control.

4. Consider the following questions in writing your draft:

https://privacycenter.instagram.com/policy/?entry_point=ig_help_center_data_policy_redirect

- What kind of data is handled by the site?
Photos, videos, messages, profile info, comments, likes, followers, location info, app usage.
- What services does the site provide?
Posting photos/videos, messaging friends, Stories, Reels, following accounts, and social interaction.
- How does the site support itself financially?
Ads (personalized and sponsored), partnerships, brand promotions.

5. Compare the section of your imaginary privacy policy with the respective section of the site's real policy, and consider the following questions:

- How does your policy compare to the real one? Are there any significant differences?

My policy is simpler and easier to read, while Instagram's real one is more detailed and legal.

Both allow deactivation and deletion, but the real policy has more legal wording about backups, logs, and exceptions.

- What surprises you about the company's privacy policy?

Even after deleting your account, some info can remain in backups for legal or security reasons. I didn't realize you can't completely erase everything instantly.
